

The Tale Of The Three Sisters

I heard a new story today. Actually it is an old story... it was just one I hadn't heard before. One of my clients was telling me about a place where he used to live. It was by the Blue Mountains of Australia. He described it by saying "imagine the Grand Canyon... only green and full of life." He said he lived within walking distance from the three sisters.

When I said I didn't know who the three sisters were, he told me the Aboriginal legend of 'Meehni', 'Wimlah' and 'Gunnedoo'. They were three beautiful sisters of the Katoomba tribe. They were in love with three brothers who were from a neighboring tribe. Unfortunately, their tribal laws forbade any possible relationship from forming between them.

The brothers, being members of a warrior tribe, decided to take their chosen females by force. In order to protect the girls during the ensuing battle, a witch doctor cast a spell which turned the sisters into stone. The plan was to restore them to human form after the battle was over. Unfortunately the witch doctor was killed in the skirmish and no one else knew how to reverse the spell. And so the sisters remain – frozen in stone overlooking the lovely Jamison Valley in New South Wales, Australia.

What a sad story in such a beautiful location but it does answer a question I had. We were in Sedona Arizona last year when I noticed this unusual rock formation.

I always wondered what happened to Snoopy.
